

A visit to a wholesale flower auction takes a little checking before you set out: confirm that visitors are allowed and learn where they can observe safely. Plan for an early, busy market, with rules that may affect entry, photography, and buying.

Confirm visitor access and timing

A wholesale auction is a place where people handle daily business, not automatically a public attraction. Some sites welcome guests on a set route or offer guided visits; others admit only registered buyers and sellers. Read the auction's visitor information before making plans, and reserve a place in advance if that is required.

Guest hours may not match the hours when flowers are being traded. Much of the activity happens early, so turning up in the afternoon could mean finding a quieter hall. Ask which days and times are likely to show the market at its busiest. That small check can make the difference between seeing carts move through the building and arriving after much of the action has passed.

Work out how to get to the site and where guests should enter or park. A large auction building may have different doors for employees, buyers, and visitors. Checking the entrance beforehand is easier than searching for the right one while people are moving loads of flowers around you.

Follow the auction process

Each auction sets its own rules and may sell flowers in a particular way. At some markets, buyers use an auction clock, where the price shown drops until someone accepts it. Decisions can happen in seconds, and a buyer may take part remotely rather than signal from the room.

Sales may cover whole batches, not single stems. Buyers can use details such as flower variety, number of stems, quality, and origin to decide what to offer. From a visitor route, some of this information may be hard to see. A guide or display can help explain what is being sold as each lot passes.

Entry does not necessarily give you permission to bid. Wholesale auctions often require buyers to register, and purchasing may be restricted to people in the trade. If you hope to take flowers home, ask in advance who can buy and whether there is a minimum quantity.

Prepare for the floors and rules

Wear closed, comfortable shoes and bring an extra layer. Large halls and areas where flowers are handled can be cool, and walking around may take longer than expected. A compact bag is also easier to carry through a busy building than bulky luggage.

Keep a few simple precautions in mind while you visit:

- Use the visitor route marked out for guests and do what staff ask.
- Leave room for carts and vehicles, and keep away from doors and loading spaces.
- Ask before taking pictures, particularly if workers or buyers could appear in them.
- Check in advance whether food, drinks, or children are allowed.

Let the people working there get on with their jobs. A display of fresh flowers may invite a closer look, but the carts still need a clear path.

Useful details to check

Can visitors take flowers home?

That may be possible, but do not assume it is. Contact the auction to ask about purchases by visitors and any buyer registration rules. If the site has a separate retail area, it may operate under different conditions.

How much time should I set aside?

The right amount depends on the location and if you plan to take a tour. Check how long the site recommends for a visit, then leave extra time to travel there and locate the guest entrance. A few spare minutes can help if the building is large or the entrance is not obvious.

See also: floral design at premieres