Getting Your Texas Crash Report After a Midland Wreck The official record of your wreck is a form called the Texas Peace Officer's Crash Report, better known as the CR-3. When a police officer, deputy or state trooper investigates a crash, this is the report they file. Insurance companies read it early, and it often shapes their first opinion about who was at fault. That makes it one of the first documents worth getting your hands on. It usually includes a diagram, a short narrative, the officer's notes on contributing factors and details about each driver and vehicle. Read every section, not just the part about fault. Which agency wrote your report depends on where the crash happened. Wrecks inside city limits, like a collision on Wall Street downtown, at Garfield Street and Loop 250, or along Big Spring Street in northeast Midland, are usually worked by the Midland Police Department. Crashes in unincorporated parts of the county, such as out around Greenwood, may be handled by the Midland County Sheriff's Office. On state highways and rural roads, including stretches of SH 191, SH 349 and Interstate 20 outside town, the Texas Department of Public Safety often responds. Knowing the agency helps when you need to follow up with the officer who wrote the Midland auto accident attorney report. You can buy a copy of the CR-3 through TxDOT's Crash Records Information System, known as CRIS. Having the crash date, the county and the name of a driver involved on hand can make the search easier. The report may not show up right away, since the officer has to finish and submit it first. If you were taken from the scene to Midland Memorial Hospital, a family member may be able to help look it up while you recover.

Consistent treatment records, doctor notes and a daily pain journal help. The Midland team investigates beyond the police report to build evidence that insurers can't easily dismiss. Can I get compensation for anxiety after a car accident? Yes, Texas law allows recovery for mental anguish when it is tied to the crash and properly documented.
