A crack on the back of a phone and a crack on the front look much alike when you are holding the handset, but they are different repairs with different costs and different urgency. Knowing which one you have makes it easier to decide what to do next, and whether it has to be sorted today or can wait a little. Many people ignore a cracked back for months because the phone still seems to work, then discover the damage has quietly grown.

A cracked screen affects the part you touch and look at every day. Even a phone screen repair small crack can let dust and moisture in, the glass can split further with each knock, and sharp edges can catch your fingers. Touch response and display quality may suffer too. Cracked back glass is mostly about appearance and protection. The phone may carry on working normally, though splintered glass can still cut, moisture can find a way in around the damage, and on phones that charge wirelessly the back sits between the charger and the phone. Neither crack improves with time, so it pays to look at them sooner rather than later.

Cost is the other difference. At Free Fusion in Corby an iPhone screen replacement starts from £24.99, while an iPhone back glass replacement starts from £50. The back usually costs more because the job is more involved, and sometimes the body of the phone needs attention as well. We also carry out back glass and chassis replacement more generally, and we tell you what your particular phone needs before you commit to anything.

So which should you fix first? If the front is cracked, deal with that first, because it affects safety and everyday use. If only the back is cracked and the phone works normally, you can pick a time that suits you, although a case and a strip of clear tape over any sharp edges will help in the meantime. If both are damaged, a free diagnosis for local customers lets us look at the whole phone, and most screen replacements are finished in about an hour while you wait or step out. Because the two repairs are priced differently, it helps to know which glass is damaged before you phone around for quotes, and we are always happy to talk it through.
