

Council Bluffs and Southwest Iowa Clients Omaha Law Firm Licensed in Iowa The Missouri River marks the line between Nebraska and Iowa, yet for thousands of people who live in Council Bluffs and work in Omaha, or the other way around, the river is just part of the commute. Legal matters are not always so flexible. A contract signed in Nebraska, a business registered in Iowa, a family with property in both states: each can raise questions that depend on which state's law applies and which courts will hear a dispute. That is one reason Council Bluffs and southwest Iowa clients look to Erickson | Sederstrom P.C., L.L.O., an Omaha law firm whose attorneys are licensed across Nebraska, Iowa, South Dakota, Colorado and Kansas. The firm's Iowa connections go beyond licensing. It counts the Iowa Bar Association among its affiliations, alongside the Nebraska State Bar Association, the Omaha Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Matters involving Council Bluffs typically move through the Iowa courts, including the district court for Pottawattamie County, while Nebraska matters are heard in Douglas County District Court or the federal courthouse in downtown Omaha. Having attorneys comfortable on both sides of the river helps clients avoid juggling separate firms for a single problem. The legal needs in southwest Iowa look a lot like those in Omaha, with a few twists. Trucking and logistics companies along the I-80 and I-29 corridors often face injury claims and insurance defense questions, and the firm's insurance practice defends trucking accident, injury and death claims. Employers with workers in both states need to understand how non-compete rules differ, and the firm has published comparisons of non-compete law across Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Colorado and South Dakota. Farm families in Pottawattamie, Mills and Harrison counties frequently ask about business and farm succession planning, while Council Bluffs business owners seek a corporate lawyer for formation, governance and eventual transition planning.
