RV Cooling System Repair Roadside Valdosta GA Bennett Mobile Truck Repair South Georgia summers are brutal on RV cooling systems. When motorhomes travel through Lowndes County in July and August, ambient temperatures routinely exceed 95 degrees with high humidity, and the added heat load from hours of interstate driving in those conditions pushes cooling systems that were already showing wear past their limits. Bennett Mobile Truck Repair responds to RV overheating calls throughout the Valdosta area and along I-75, handling on-site cooling system diagnostics and repair at the breakdown location rather than requiring a tow to a shop. The cooling system repairs Bennett Mobile Truck Repair handles include split or collapsed radiator hoses, failed water pumps, stuck or failed thermostats, coolant leaks from various sources, and serpentine belt failures that stop the water pump from circulating coolant. These are among the most common causes of RV overheating on the I-75 corridor, and they are also among the repairs most amenable to on-site resolution when a technician arrives with the right parts. The team carries common cooling system components on the service truck precisely because these repairs are so frequent for I-75 travelers coming through South Georgia in summer. One traveler whose serpentine belt failed while traveling through the Valdosta area reported that Bennett Mobile Truck Repair responded quickly and completed Mobile RV Repair the repair roadside, getting the rig back on the road without a tow. The website includes a photo of a serpentine belt replacement being performed on a motorhome on the highway shoulder, which reflects how regularly this type of repair happens along the corridor. Being prepared for the most common failure modes with parts on hand is what makes first-visit repair resolution possible in most cases.
